

HUMAN SERVICES

Human Services workers are committed to helping individuals, families, and groups function more effectively and overcome considerable individual and social challenges. These professionals help people deal with economic inequality; physical and mental health challenges including addictions; as well as difficulties with housing, employment, and education. The minor in human services provides students with important content drawn from the fields of social work, counseling, addiction and recovery services, and child life. The minor prepares future human services professionals to successfully navigate social and community contexts, institutional resources and barriers, as well as individual and group dynamics.
